“Poly-substance abuse—cocaine, crack, marijuana, or prescription drugs in conjunction with alcohol—is becoming the new norm.”

How have you seen addiction evolve?

We're seeing less and less of the “vanilla alcoholic,” someone who abuses only alcohol. Poly-substance abuse—cocaine, crack, marijuana, or prescription drugs in conjunction with alcohol—is becoming the new norm. Opiate addiction has skyrocketed. We're also seeing quite a lot of dual diagnoses—bipolar disorder, psychoses, OCD, ADHD, PTSD, severe anxiety, and depression. Clients often substitute other behaviors—like eating disorders and sex addiction—for their substance of choice, once they stop using. Our clinicians are trained to address these problems and educate clients about the neurobiology behind it all.

Why is spirituality so integral to your program?

Our recovery program is rooted in the basic tenets of AA, which stress the importance of connecting with a higher power. You've got to develop a healthy connection with something that centers you, something that helps rebalance those neurochemicals—GABA and glutamate—that addiction skews.

What I Know

We're social beings. We don't live in isolation. Everything we do has a relational impact upon those who are closest to us. It's never just about the client we're working with. Addiction is a family systems illness, involving everyone related to the client. Consciously or not, each person also contributes to how the illness proceeds. Recovery, therefore, is a process that everyone must go through. It's really about integration, learning how to be in relationships again, learning to recognize and process emotions. With addicts, substances become their primary relationship. They become disconnected from other people—not to mention themselves and the world at large.
